

Dear Sirs and Madams,

I am a victim of a domestic violent relationship that lasted [REDACTED] years before I found my way out we have a [REDACTED] year old son that at the moment spends [REDACTED] hours a fortnight with his father.

From the moment I left I have had an AVO on him with our son as protected person. In [REDACTED] this year he applied for an AVO against myself and my parents and our son as protected person on my parents, he was granted by the courts after lying on documents an interim order against me for issues dating back to [REDACTED].

After several court appearance this matter was withdraw by him as he was unable to prove his allegation he had made against me and my family. I have now since been charged by the police for breaching an interim order and have to go to court to fight this false allegation which is becoming emotional damaging to me and another form of family violence from this man

I firmly believe that if this judge who had granted this interim order had access to my files at the court this would never have been granted. Surely there has to be a system in place that allows judges to look up files on people before they can be granted an AVO this is meant to protect the victim not the perpetrator.

Considering he has an extensive criminal history including breaching AVO I would like to know how a Judge can think this is ok to cause more family violence against a victim that is lucky to be alive and has her son safe.

I think it's about time that Judges take these issues more seriously instead of just palming them off.

Thank you for your time in reading this and I do hope for the best.

[REDACTED]